In his visual work Lucebert often does the opposite of what he sees and combats in the world around him: he gives mastery to his powerlessness, uses the weapons of his artistry, rather than abusing power in order to impose his will on other people and on the things he makes. During the crisis years of the thirties – when Lucebert was a boy of about ten living in a working-class district of Amsterdam – the violent suppression by the army and police of a revolt by the The Poet and The Painter made a deep impression on .
